

"I know this "old-school sailor" stepped into the school of modern electronics (with Furuno's NavNet)"

Dear Furuno:

"Playing video games again?" was the question I continued to hear last summer as I delivered a 61 foot sailboat from San Francisco, CA to Ensenada, Mexico. My crew, Chuck an old-school sailor for nearly 60 years, was fascinated with the Furuno NavNet multi-task big screen with radar, depth and plotter. The new owners had recently installed the NavNet and I was looking forward to some hands-on use, since I have used other multi-task screens on other deliveries.

For the first few days Chuck hardly pushed any buttons, but he listened and watched as I taught the owners how to move from screen to screen, change radar and plotter range, go from depth to plotter and back to radar. I was having a great time, was impressed at how easy it was to move from screen to screen and found the buttons user friendly. I did feel like I was playing video games. During Chuck's night watch I know he was flipping through the different functions on the NavNet as the screen set-up and ranges had been changed.

Since the delivery, I have frequently heard "old-school sailor Chuck" chatting up the Furuno NavNet electronics. I smile as I know this "old-school sailor" stepped into the school of modern electronics and loved it.

Submitted as a TRUE sea story and experience.
